COLLEGE OF EDUCATION + HUMAN DEVELOPMENT
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

2019 ANNUAL REPORT

The University of Minnesota College of Education and Human Development is one of the only colleges in the country that combines education and human development. When our college formed in 2006, some people initially questioned the logic of bringing together such an array of academic disciplines. What could teacher education, child development, educational psychology, family social science, social work, kinesiology, and leadership development possibly have in common? The answer is quite simple: our teaching, research, and outreach improves lives across the lifespan.

It would be impossible to list all that's been accomplished in our college in the last year, but here are a few highlights:

- We were awarded two National Institutes of Health grants to conduct research aimed at earlier detection of autism, which could lead to earlier intervention and better outcomes for children and their families. At the same time, we are improving access to autism intervention services via technology through our Telehealth Lab.
- We received expanded funding from the Minnesota Legislature so we can provide additional continuing education for school administrators; and we received new legislative funding so we can provide continuing education for the state's child welfare workers.
- We premiered a documentary film that addresses the underappreciated and underfunded work of direct support professionals to draw attention to the looming crisis for our disability and elder communities.
- We were awarded grants from the National Institutes of Health and National Science Foundation to develop new therapies and medical device prototypes to improve motor function for people with dystonia or those suffering from stroke or Parkinson's disease.

All of our work is driven by our belief in the inherent value of each person and our desire to improve lives through our research and community collaborations. We also know we can have a sustained impact on the world by preparing education and human services professionals—and providing them with continuing education—so they can share their knowledge with others and be our partners in improving lives around the world.
